Robert Kelpatrick, sworn deposed - being a miner residing at East Wellington; knew the deceased Chinaman Foo Kung by sight only; saw the deceased alive on the morning of April 30th - on the day on which he was hurt; the deceased was injured at the same time that Neil McLean was killed; cannot say what the Chinaman was doing when he got hurt; saw the deceased Chinaman on the west side of East Hill's gallery after he received his injury; I am opinion that the deceased received his injury from a fall of rock from the roof; it was the same fall of rock that killed McLean; the deceased was in the habit of hauling coal for McLean; the rock was full of slips and of a slaty nature; was the first to go into McLean's place and saw the deceased sitting on the road holding his leg and complaining of it; the Chinaman was screaming as if in pain; he made no remarks as to how he was injured; after taking McLean out we examined the place and found a hole as though McLean had been in the act of charging it also found his charging gear there; in my opinion the rock slipped from the roof near the face, while McLean was charging the hole; the fall of the rock in my opinion injured the deceased Chinaman Foo Kung; felt the leg of the deceased and found that it was broke close to the ankle; the deceased was put in a box and removed by his fellow Chinamen; have not seen him since; anybody would have considered the place safe, would have done so myself if I had been there;

By Mr. A. Dick, Inspector of Mines - I do not <sup>know</sup> if the deceased is the same Chinaman that was hurt at the time McLean was killed; there was considerable rock fall at that time; the rock was a kind of soft or loose rock.

which was likely to come down after standing for a time; the rock was between 18 and 20 inches thick; the rock had dropped close to the face and from a slip; cant say whether the rock should have been timbered or not; the rock would have had to be taken down anyway; think if the Lean thought the rock was loose he would have taken it down & put a prop to support it temporarily;
